How to calculate z score table

home / math / z-score calculator Use this calculator to compute the z-score of a normal distribution. Z-score and Probability Converter Please provide any one value to convert between z-score and probability. This is the equivalent of referencing a z-table. Probability between Two Z-scores Use this calculator to find the probability (area P in the diagram) between two z-scores. RelatedStandard Deviation Calculator What is z-score? The z-score, also referred to as standard score, z-value, and normal score, among other things, is a dimensionless quantity that is used to indicate the signed, fractional, number of standard deviations by which an event is above the mean value being measured. Values above the mean have positive z-scores, while values below the mean have negative z-scores. The z-score can be calculated by subtracting the population mean from the raw score, or data point in question (a test score, height, age, etc.), then dividing the difference by the population standard deviation: where x is the raw score, μ is the population mean, and σ is the population standard deviation. The z-score has numerous applications and can be used to perform a z-test, calculate prediction intervals, process control applications, comparison of scores on different scales, and more. Z-table A z-table, also known as a standard normal table or unit normal table, is a table that consists of standardized values that are used to determine the probability that a given statistic is below, above, or between the standard normal distribution. The table below is a right-tail z-table. Although there are a number of types of z-tables, the right-tail z-table is commonly what is meant when a z-table is referenced. It is used to find the area between $z = 0$ and any positive value, and reference the area to the right-hand side of the standard deviation curve. Z Table from Mean (0 to Z) Use this z table, also referred as z score table, standard normal distribution table and z value chart, to find a z score. You will also find a z score calculator right after the tables Here is an example of how a z-score applies to a real life situation and how it can be calculated using a z-table. Imagine a group of 200 applicants who took a math test. George was among the best takers and he got 700 points (X) out of 1000. The average score was 600 (μ) and the standard deviation was 150 (σ). Now we would like to know how well George performed compared to his peers.We need to standardize his score (i.e. calculate a z-score corresponding to his actual test score) and use a z-table to determine how well he did on the test relative to his peers. In order to derive the z-score we need to use the following formula: Therefore: Z score = $(700-600) / 150 = 0.67$ Now, in order to figure out how well George did on the test we need to determine the percentage of his peers who go higher and lower scores. That's where z-table (i.e. standard normal distribution table) comes handy. If you noticed there are two z-tables with negative and positive values. If a z-score calculation yields a negative standardized score refer to the 1st table, when positive used the 2nd table. For George's example we need to use the 2nd table as his test result corresponds to a positive z-score of 0.67. Finding a corresponding probability is fairly easy. Find the first two digits on the y axis (0.6 in our example). Then go to the x axis to find the second decimal number (0.07 in this case). The number is 0.7486. Multiply this number by 100 to get percentages. So $0.7486 \times 100 = 74.86\%$. This means that almost 75% of the students scored lower than George and only 25% scored higher. 75% out of 200 students is 150. George did better than 150 students. More data visualization examples and interplay of statistics and graphical representation is covered on the data-visualization.org blog. Like kids of every generation, young people these days have many slang terms that adults are unlikely to understand. Here you'll find a handy guide to Gen Z slang that will help translate exactly what your favorite kids are attempting to communicate. You might even find some of them slipping into your own vocabulary.FamWho is this "fam" your teen is always so delighted to greet when they answer the phone? Well, rest assured that fam is highly unlikely to be the identity of your kid's awkwardly named best friend. It's actually a term of endearment that's short for "family." Photo Courtesy: StockSnap/Pixabay Don't let this confuse you, however, because it doesn't necessarily mean "family" in the traditional biological sense. It refers to your closest friends or members of your chosen social tribe. You may also hear the terms "bro" or "sis" being used in much the same manner.GhostResist the urge to bust out the sage even if you hear your teen remark that someone has "ghosted" them. While not a good thing, the term doesn't actually have any supernatural implications. It basically means that someone has stopped communicating with them, usually in an abrupt manner. Photo Courtesy: Fangirl/Pixabay Ghosting is a common, albeit immature, way to attempt to end a relationship without actually having an awkward break-up conversation. The ghoster simply begins ignoring calls, texts, face to face interaction and all other communication in the hopes that the other person will get the hint and move on.Clap BackThe "clapback" is a celebrated form of verbal retaliation against someone who has attempted to hurt your feelings. It's executed by responding to a rude remark or insult with an absolutely perfect comeback that's designed to shut down the original insulter. Photo Courtesy: Instinctmag/Twitter This is generally achieved by using wit in order to nullify the original insult by making the person look stupid for their ill-conceived attack. You know all those brilliant responses you later wish you'd said when in an argument? A clapback is achieved when you actually do.BopBop is a title awarded to a song that the speaker highly enjoys. For instance, should your favorite Gen Z member's song come on the radio, you might hear them exclaim, "This song is such a bop!" Should a song achieve bop status in a car full of teens, the polite thing to do is to turn up the volume. Photo Courtesy: StockSnap/Pixabay Actually "bopping," aka hopping to the rhythm is then likely to ensue. Should you consider yourself a less-than-experienced bopper, you should feel free to join in with a slight nodding along to the rhythm.WigShould a young person exclaim "Wig!" in your presence, there's not necessarily any need to send your hand flying up to steady your toupee. "Wig" is actually a verbal celebration of something amazing or incredible happening. It's meant to imply that you're so excited that your metaphorical wig has flown off. Photo Courtesy: Gracinstudies/Pixabay Should you like to incorporate it into your own language, you might use it as a response when your favorite teen announces getting an A on a test or winning a ball game. They'll probably be so surprised to hear you say it that they might just wig too.Cap and No CapTo cap or not to cap, that is the question. Used in the context of Gen Z, however, "capping" has nothing to do with headwear. A "cap" is a lie, so to accuse a statement of being a cap is to declare that it's false. Photo Courtesy: Olichel/Pixabay "No cap," on the other hand, is often used at either the beginning or end of a statement that the speaker wishes to emphasize is true. It pretty much means "no lie." For instance, you might hear your Gen Z grandkids say, "Grandma, these cookies are the best, no cap."WatchingDon't panic if you hear your kids or grandkids making plans to "twatch" because it's not nearly as dirty as it sounds. A combination of the words "Twitter" and "Watch," twatching means following a live event on Twitter instead of watching the entire thing unfold on TV. Photo Courtesy: Averyanovphoto/Pixabay In case you're unfamiliar, Twitter is a social media platform that's sort of like a constantly updated virtual newspaper. Except the articles are all a few sentences long or less ... and mostly written by people who are in no way actual reporters.FlexIf someone is "flexing," they're showing off their money or luxury items in a less than humble way. The point of a good flex is to brag about your riches in such a way that implies that they make you better than your fellows. Photo Courtesy: Mariamichelle/Pixabay Flexing is acceptable when performed by rappers or other celebrities whose wealth is an important part of their image. Too much flexing by a regular person, however, can get very annoying very quickly. You may hear kids comment that someone who posts a braggly twitter photo is "tryna (trying to) flex."Lit/Lit "Lit" is one of those words that can get a little tricky due to its variety of possible meanings. It can be a state of being, an affirmative exclamation, or an adjective. If referring to a person who is currently consuming alcohol, then being "lit" means that they are insanely drunk. Photo Courtesy: Free-Photos/Pixabay In other contexts, however, lit can be used as a description of something that was or is very good, fun or exciting. You might, for instance, hear a young person enthusiastically describe a concert they attended recently as, "So lit!"PeriodThough "period" is a blatant misspelling of "period," in this case, the error is intentional. The idea is that the extra "t" at the end of the word somehow emphasizes its finality even more. Periodt is often used to mean "end of discussion" in a way that stresses that there is no room for argument. Photo Courtesy: epicantus/Twitter It's also occasionally uttered as "and that's on period," to provide even more emphasis to an already emphasized statement. As you may have gleaned, once the phrase has been uttered, there's little point in continuing the conversation.Throw ShadeThis is one you'll likely understand easily, as the art of throwing shade is as old as time. Shade itself is a verbal or nonverbal expression of contempt towards another person. To "throw shade" means to express such disrespect or judgment in a casual or underhanded manner. Photo Courtesy: Bravo/YouTube It's basically being disrespectful but in a slick, passive-aggressive manner. One might throw shade by giving someone a backhanded compliment, looking them up and down with an obviously judgemental stare or making a joke at the shadee's expense.Low Key and High KeyWhen you hear a member of Gen Z describe something as "low key," it can mean several things depending on what they're referring to. If referring to a low-key event, it means that it will be an intimate gathering with only a few people. If they are keeping a relationship low-key, it means that it's not yet public knowledge and that they'd prefer to keep it that way. Photo Courtesy: Pexels/Pixabay While low-key is a well-established phrase, high-key is newer. It's the opposite and means that something is intense, out in the open or well known in the speaker's social world.SlayDespite the seemingly negative connotations of slaying something, it actually means something good when used as slang. To "slay" something indicates success, which makes sense when you consider that the victor has slain their enemies. This young man, for example, is slaying when it comes to skateboarding skills. Photo Courtesy: JEShoots-com/Pixabay Apart from achievements and talents, one's outfit can also "slay" by being incredibly attractive or pleasing to the eye. You might, for instance, hear young girls referring to an actress who "slayed" on the red carpet by wearing an outfit they really liked.Tea "Tea" in no way actually involves a beverage, although it does refer to the juicy gossip you may have occasionally shared while sipping the drink. Remember the old phrase "spill the beans?" Now "spilling the tea" is pretty much the same thing, as apparently beans have gone out of style. Photo Courtesy: Cuncon/Twitter If someone asks for the tea about a given situation, they want to know the most scandalous information about it. Alternatively, "tea" can be used as a sign of agreement. For instance, if someone says "she's better off without him," her friend might affirm, "tea."BasicIf someone is described as "basic," then they don't tend to be the type of person who thinks for themselves. A term most commonly applied to girls, it indicates that the person in question likes things more because everyone else likes them than because they personally find them appealing. Photo Courtesy: PublicDomainPictures/Pixabay Basic girls tend to be incredibly girly and enjoy pink things and whatever happens to be trendy at the moment. They can commonly be found drinking pumpkin spice lattes at Starbucks, playing Candy Crush or shopping for a new pair of UgG boots.ShookHave you ever felt shaken up? If so, then you too have experienced what it is to be "shook." Being shook refers to being very emotionally impacted by something due to its surprising, shocking or scary nature. You may find yourself shook after enduring a sudden breakup or hearing about the death of a celebrity. Photo Courtesy: JEShoots-com/Pixabay Though shook generally refers to a negative emotional state, it can be a good thing on occasion. Getting a large amount of money or winning a contest when you thought you had no chance could leave you pleasantly shook.Bye, Felicia! If you ever hear a young person say "Bye, Felicia" even though no one named Felicia is present, then rest assured it's not a red flag that your mind is starting to go. This phrase originated from the hilarious 1995 movie Friday, starring rapper and actor Ice Cube. Photo Courtesy: Imdb There was a very unappealing character in the film named Felicia, and her name lives on in the form of this pop culture send-off. If someone says "Bye, Felicia," it's a way to tell someone to go away and that they're unlikely to be missed.VSCO GirlIf your daughter or granddaughter announces that she's a VSCO, girl then get ready to hear a great deal about the importance of saving sea turtles. Named after an online photo editing app, VSCO (pronounced "Visco") girls have become a breed all their own. Photo Courtesy: Shared News/YouTube A mix of many stereotypes, the VSCO girl loves the beach, friendship bracelets, oversized t-shirts with shorts and scrunchies. They tend to be a tad overenthusiastic about saving the environment and speak an odd language that consists of strange utterances such as "and I opp" and "skksk." They're a whole article in their own right.SaltyIf a young person encourages you to stop being so salty, then it's time to take a good look at your mood and how it's affecting others. Being salty means that you're bitter, upset or frustrated with a situation, and odds are that you're directly or indirectly letting everyone around you know it. Photo Courtesy: nastya_gepp/Pixabay You can also use the term to label others who are currently exhibiting an unpleasant disposition. For example, you might say, "Betty was so salty that my casserole and enjoy pink things and whatever happens to be trendy at the moment. They can commonly be found drinking pumpkin spice lattes at Starbucks, playing Candy Crush or shopping for a new pair of UgG boots.ShookHave you ever felt shaken up? If so, then you too have experienced what it is to be "shook." Being shook refers to being very emotionally impacted by something due to its surprising, shocking or scary nature. You may find yourself shook after enduring a sudden breakup or hearing about the death of a celebrity. Photo Courtesy: JEShoots-com/Pixabay Though shook generally refers to a negative emotional state, it can be a good thing on occasion. Getting a large amount of money or winning a contest when you thought you had no chance could leave you pleasantly shook.Bye, Felicia! If you ever hear a young person say "Bye, Felicia" even though no one named Felicia is present, then rest assured it's not a red flag that your mind is starting to go. This phrase originated from the hilarious 1995 movie Friday, starring rapper and actor Ice Cube. Photo Courtesy: Imdb There was a very unappealing character in the film named Felicia, and her name lives on in the form of this pop culture send-off. If someone says "Bye, Felicia," it's a way to tell someone to go away and that they're unlikely to be missed.VSCO GirlIf your daughter or granddaughter announces that she's a VSCO, girl then get ready to hear a great deal about the importance of saving sea turtles. Named after an online photo editing app, VSCO (pronounced "Visco") girls have become a breed all their own. Photo Courtesy: Shared News/YouTube A mix of many stereotypes, the VSCO girl loves the beach, friendship bracelets, oversized t-shirts with shorts and scrunchies. They tend to be a tad overenthusiastic about saving the environment and speak an odd language that consists of strange utterances such as "and I opp" and "skksk." They're a whole article in their own right.SaltyIf a young person encourages you to stop being so salty, then it's time to take a good look at your mood and how it's affecting others. Being salty means that you're bitter, upset or frustrated with a situation, and odds are that you're directly or indirectly letting everyone around you know it.
